

Pancakes

Prep time: 5 minutes

Cooking time: 25 minutes

Servings: up to 16 pancakes, 24 cm in diameter

Per 100 g:

Calories 263 kcal

Carbohydrates 32 g

- Of which sugars 2 g

Protein 9 g

Fat 11 g

Diet: low-sugar, vegetarian

Ingredients

1 full glass plus 2 tablespoons of wheat flour - 230 g

3 medium eggs - about 165 g when cracked

1 glass of milk - 250 ml

1 glass of water - 250 ml

4 tablespoons vegetable oil—about 40 ml

a pinch of salt

Pancakes

My glass has a capacity of 250 ml.

To cook the pancakes, I used a wide pancake pan:

24 cm in diameter.

With the given amount of ingredients, I made 16 very thin pancakes.

Take the eggs out of the refrigerator ahead of time. You can also lightly warm the milk to a temperature no higher than 40 degrees.

The calories were calculated based on the ingredients I used.

This is therefore an approximate calorie count, since even the flour may have a different calorie content than the one I used.

I make pancakes at least once a week. It's a simple, quick dish that kids love. You can serve them with any meal throughout the day. You can take pancakes to work, to school, or on a picnic. They're simply divine!

Pancake Recipe

Pour a full glass of wheat flour into a bowl, plus two more tablespoons of flour. That's about 230 grams of flour. I usually use cake flour or all-purpose flour. Crack three medium-sized eggs into the bowl, then pour in a glass of milk and a glass of water (plain or sparkling). Add a pinch of salt and pour in four tablespoons of vegetable oil, such as rice bran oil or grapeseed oil.

Mix the batter for a few minutes until smooth to get rid of any lumps. You can let the batter rest for 30 minutes to allow it to settle. This isn't necessary, though—I always recommend letting the batter rest to achieve the perfect consistency.

If you're making sweet pancake batter, you can use your favorite fruit-flavored soda instead of water. You can also replace the oil with melted and cooled butter or coconut oil (also melted and cooled).

If you're making savory pancakes, you can use beer instead of water (for adults only).

Heat a flat skillet well—preferably one specifically designed for frying pancakes. Don't set the burner to the highest heat right away.

Set the heat to medium and wait until the heat is evenly distributed across the entire cooking surface of the pan.

Stir the batter and use a small ladle to measure out a portion for each pancake. Pour just enough batter onto the pan so that it covers the surface.

Each time you pour a portion of batter, lift the pan off the burner. Immediately swirl the pan so the batter spreads across the entire surface. The pancakes should be thin. You can even pour the excess batter back into the bowl each time. That way, you'll end up with more, but super-thin pancakes.

After about 40–50 seconds, flip the pancake over to the other side. The other side usually takes about half as long. Here, you might find a flat spatula useful for flipping the pancakes. Cook all the pancakes this way.

Good to know:

- Your first pancake won't end up in the trash if you patiently wait for the pan to heat up properly.
- After adding oil to the batter, there's no need to grease the pan. This will prevent the pancakes from sticking.
- As soon as you pour the batter into the pan, start spreading it over the entire surface. It's a good idea to lift the pan briefly at this point.
- To keep the pancakes from drying out after they're cooked, cover them with a cotton dish towel.
- If you pour a little extra batter into the pan, you can also use the pancakes to make croquettes.
- If you want the pancakes to be golden brown and slightly crispy while they're cooking, spread a little butter in the pan before each pancake. These pancakes will be a bit thicker, so you'll probably end up with about 10–14 of them.

Be sure to let us know what your favorite pancakes are and how often you make them.

Enjoy!